Unlike many other organizations, the NEAEP interprets the meaning of "practitioner" as broad, including farriers as full members of the association. Eighty percent of equine lameness occurs within the hoof, while ten percent of horses will experience at least one episode of lameness each year – this alone presents the necessity for veterinarians and farriers to practice complementary to one another. The decision to assemble an organization which supports veterinarians and farriers alike is a testament to the importance the NEAEP places on maintaining positive working relationships between these two communities, as well as providing top quality continuing education opportunities to further enhance our ability to serve the equine patient.
